Fair warning: really detailed pictures like an adult would want but most all the pictures have an extreme excess of black ink already filled in to each picture....in other words- it's supposed to be line work for you to color- but some genius has already filled in huge gaps in each picture with dark black ink which prevents you from in fact making your own color choices; defeating the purpose of why you got the book in the first place. People get intricate coloring books so they can color the line work themselves- here it's been done for you in many spots- in a black so deep that even coloring over it wouldn't help. They should have left the designs open with just line work. The publisher made a big mistake filling in so much for you with dark as night black ink thus denying you the chance to pick your own colors. The more I leaf through this book the more disappointed I become. Like the art but it's really more a picture book than a coloring books because of the way it was printed. Don't be fooled; your ability to color this book in is somewhat limited- and that's being generous. Could have been a lot better. Why do publishers feel they have to fill in solid black ink for grown people when even less intricate books use just line work so you can actually color? Meh- im getting out the Flintstone coloring books I bought here and using those. Why? Because at least they are not already colored in for me as this book is. Wasted opportunity. In a coloring book the black ink goes on the lines- not inside the picture itself; as this is supposed to be a coloring book not a graphic art book or a comic book where the inker adds shading. In a coloring book the end user can add all the black pigment he wants in ways he chooses with his own tools- it does not need to be done by the publisher.
